THE INTERNATIONAL MAGA-ZINE FOR FEBRUARY.—The entire Press of the Union appear to concur in the opinion that this is the "union MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD," as it is characterized by the

We have reserved the February number of the interesting monthy the periodical appearance of which we have learned to hook for with high arthersation. The present number opens with a memoir of Chatteston, embellished with seven illustrations. Next tollows the editor's very ample and always instructive summary of literary in telligence, under the site of "Authors and Bolas," which everybody must read with pleasure, and which perhaps no person could prepare to the same extent as the editor of the leterations.

From the Burlington Sentine!

The editor, whe contributes some of the heat portions of the Magazine, as known to scholars, as having a better acquisitance with American and European letters than any other man now living. His mitelligent and discriminating editorship of the "International," is, more than everything else, what is a given it the high and marked favor which if olds with cultivated reades. With this prominent seventage, and the faultless mouner in which the work is printed, it as no marved that its success is so soon established.

The high expectations raised by the first numbers of this best of the Magazines have been fully realized by the sufferprising unblishers. If there were ever a denty of the success of a work, planned so liberally, and carried on with as much takent, such doubt can exist so larger. The International is firmly based upon that sure foundation, the public favor, which has been a arried it on its morits—the press and a rapidly increasing subscription list fully evince this fact, and demonstrate that bright promise has already spend into perfect performance.

Stringer & Townsend's laternational Magazine for this mooth continues to pour down it as neuteromet golden shower of interary rait tes, presenting facts, common, gessip, criticisms and predictions, in a rapid and conversational in their style, give a liveliness to the Magazine, which is not always found in contemporary periodicals.
